The Placid Bermudian.

Bermuda Letter to the Hartford Times. Chatting with Mr. Allen the other evening, I made the remark that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to take a native Bermudian, who had never left his home, and set him suddenly in the middle of the Bowery. With the elevated trains rushing over his head, the half dozen surface roads noisily tinkling through the street, the endless crowds of people on both sides of the way, the sparkling and glittering shops on either side, the electric lamps making an artificial moonlight, the jam, "go," stir and bustle of that wonderful thoroughfare would certainly drive him insane on the
